The History of Social Work in Australia: A Critical Literature Review

by Philip Mendes, published in Australian Social Work, 58(2), June 2005.

Abstract: Historical knowledge plays an important role in the development of social work identity. Yet there has been little analysis of the historical literature on social work and social workers in Australia. Attention is drawn here to both the strengths in the existing literature, and also the major gaps in our knowledge of social work practice, education, activism, and professional organizations. Arguments are considered for a greater prioritizing of historical research within the social work profession.

Keywords: social work, history, knowledge gaps.

At present there are major gaps in our knowledge of key Australian social work organizations, activists, campaigns, and events (Roe 1999, p.11). Yet an understanding of social work history is arguably significant for the development of social work identity. In particular, an understanding of the place of social work practice in the human services arena requires a knowledge of the political, ideological, organizational and occupational dynamics of professional social work. Many contemporary struggles around social work education, professional recognition, and policy activism seem to be fought in a historical vacuum, rather than being informed by significant past experiences.
